

The attitude was very positive between the students. It very much was a “can do” and “let's do” attitude they were projecting. I can imagine being a student in this class to be something rather enjoyable. It seemed as if the students were enjoying trying to understand the fine grammar points at play.

Students seemed to understand all the grammar that was being presented to them and some of the grammar points were rather fine. For example, little, a little, few, a few. This caused some trouble at first to understand but through good board work it was picked up.

At the end of the class I had a brief chat with one of the students that I observed. She said that the class was enjoyable, provided good revision and she really likes to practice her grammar. She informed me that she finds the grammar classes productive, that she likes to “think about” what grammar rules are being used. She also told me that she prefers board-work when it comes to grammar and that she felt the class overall a positive one.